I am writing to strongly protest the proposed use of mobile phones on commercial airline flights. Those who use them in public places have little consideration of imposing their noise on others. That causes an infringement on my right of privacy. If the ban is lifted, my husband and I will talk very loud - as loud as necessary to overcome the telephone conversations we hear and we will encourage other non-users to do the same.

We will also pursue our legal right of privacy. Users of cell phones should excuse themselves in public places and a private area where no one can hear them. Obviously that is not possible on an airplane.

Please keep us informed about the FCC proposal.

Dear Regulator:

I'm writing to express my belief that allowing airline passengers to use cell phones other than what is currently allowed will be a terrible mistake.

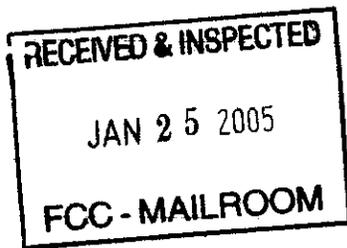

I find that most cell phone users are not considerate of persons around them while talking. It's obviously because their attention is being focused on their talking. But on the ground, I can usually walk away from their loud voices and rudeness. In the air, this won't be an option.

And it will get worse if its teenagers or children doing the talking.

And who will be the enforcers of the applicable rules? The cabin crews? Don't these personnel already have enough responsibilities to deal with?!

Gentlemen:

I vote to keep the ban on cell phones on airlines.

It's enough (or too much)
to give up physical space,
I do not understand the need for constant conversations - and so loudly!

Yours truly,

B. Shenkya

Dear Sir or Madam:

This is to express our complete opposition to the proposal to allow the use of cellular phones during flights.

Flying is already stressful - with crowds, frequent delays, narrow aisles and seats, noise from engines and from fellow passengers. Latter often disrupt one's flight with their chatter, laughter, or snoring, preventing one from reading, studying, sleeping, or working.

We don't need more distraction and stress from cellphone users.

Sincerely,
(Mrs) Joseph A. Whelan.
